

Believing in Myself

Arjun Singh

I arrived in Canada in the summer this year.

Embarking on this journey to Canada and transitioning from a secure, established role at Union Bank of India to starting afresh has been a monumental leap for me. Many have raised question on my decision including my colleagues; friends and family. My answer lies in a simple belief: without taking risks, one cannot attain success. The mantra "No risk, no gain" rings true in my heart. Moreover, it's the belief in oneself that empowers the courage to take such strides in life.

For almost a decade, I thrived in the stability of the government sector, untouched by the need for interviews to get some other job. But life demanded evolution, and I found myself craving growth. The process of continuously upgrading oneself became a source of enjoyment. It required a significant amount of courage to shift gears and present myself in a competitive job market, to showcase strengths and acknowledge weaknesses—essentially, to sell myself effectively.

I come with a diverse skill set—an amalgamation of one and a half years of advocacy experience alongside a commendable 9.5 years in banking. This fusion has honed my ability to multitask, adapt swiftly, and handle varied responsibilities adeptly.

This transition isn't merely about changing jobs or locations; it's about embracing change itself. It's about acknowledging that growth comes from stepping out of one's comfort zone, embracing challenges, and consistently evolving. I stand here today, a testament to the belief that with self-confidence, resilience, and an unwavering commitment to self-improvement, one can conquer uncharted territories and redefine success.

Thank you.
